

“Keshiki”

Yohen (literally meaning “kiln change”) is a traditional method used in ceramics that has existed since the times of old and involves utilizing the random color transformations that an object undergoes during firing. It is often used for the tea cups used in the traditional Japanese tea ceremony. The color tones created by chance are known as “keshiki,” meaning “scenery,” and people enjoy the colors and patterns that are created without intent as though looking at beautiful scenery. The variety and complexity of these color tones bring to mind images of the changing leaves in Japan in autumn, with no two the same. In this way, each of these Yohen Border tiles is slightly different from the last. Enjoy the balance of the colors chance created, and the “scenery” that unfolds in front of you.
